A House of Memories

Fiction

Eddie had spent days packing—old toys in garbage bags, new ones in boxes. His family was moving and the house had to be ready for the next family. He was not sure he liked the idea. Without furniture, the house felt big and empty. Eddie did not want to leave his home and friends behind. The last thing left to clean was the attic. Carefully, he climbed the rickety ladder after his parents.

The attic was dark and dusty, with wooden beams and strange pink fluff between them. His father was looking through old boxes and handed Eddie a faded photograph of a boy playing baseball. Eddie thought it was him, but his father said it was actually him at Eddie's age. His mother found another picture of herself playing hopscotch.

It was strange to imagine them as kids. Eddie had only seen them working, cooking or driving. Looking out of the attic's small window, he saw his backyard—the swing set, tricycle and bubble machine. He had played there for as long as he could remember.

His mother stood beside him, whispering that soon, another family would make memories here, just as they would in their new home. Eddie thought about the new school, the football team and the drama club. Maybe it was a good time to move after all.

As they climbed down, Eddie picked up the camera and asked his parents to take a picture of him playing in the backyard one last time.
